Edgar Evans

Edgar Evans was born on March 7th 1876, near Rhossili in Wales. At fifteen he joined the Royal Navy. A few years later, while serving on HMS Majestic, he met a young naval lieutenant, Robert Falcon Scott. It was a fateful meeting.

In 1911, Captain Scott, by now a famous polar explorer, wanted to be the first man to reach the South Pole. The Norwegian, Roald Amundsen, had the same intention. Scott sailed south with a large team, and after weeks of training and setting up food dumps along the intended route, he selected his team to make the final race to the pole. He chose his four best men - Petty Officer Evans, Lt. Henry Bowers, Capt. Titus Oates, and Dr. Edward Wilson. Scott described Evans as a 'giant worker'. "He is responsible for the equipment - every sledge, every sledge-fitting, the tents, sleeping-bags, harnesses, everything. He is a big man, strong, resourceful and always cheerful so he boosts our morale."

Eleven weeks after setting off from base camp, the five men reached the South Pole on 17 January 1912. They had man-hauled their sledge, with their food, tents and equipment on board, across hundreds of miles of rutted ice and snow. Imagine their despair when they saw the Norwegian flag planted in the ice. Amundsen's party had beaten them by five weeks. Disheartened, Scott's team now had to make the return journey of 1,500km back to safety. This became a desperate affair. Evans had cut his hand in an accident as they were nearing the pole, and the wound did not heal properly. During the return journey he began to deteriorate mentally as well as physically, suffering from frostbite to his fingers, nose and cheeks. Then, as they descended the Beardmore Glacier, he fell into a crevasse, sustaining a head wound and serious concussion. His condition rapidly worsened. This slowed up the progress of the party, and the food supplies gradually diminished. On 16 February 1912, nearing the base of the glacier, Evans collapsed. He died in the tent that night. In his diaries Scott described Evans as a 'spirited man' who continuously said he was fine despite his terrible condition.

By March, Oates too was suffering from severe frostbite and, knowing he was holding back his companions, walked out into the freezing night never to be seen again. The party was now three and there was no food left. The next food depot was only eleven miles away but the weather was closing in. Trapped in their tent by a ferocious blizzard, with temperatures plummeting, they could make no further progress.

The bodies of Scott and his companions were discovered by a search party on 12 November 1912 and his diary and their records retrieved. Their final camp became their tomb; a high cairn of snow was erected over it, topped by a roughly fashioned cross. In January 1913, before Terra Nova left for home, a large wooden cross was made by the ship's carpenters, inscribed with the names of the lost party and Tennyson's line from his poem Ulysses: "To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield". It was erected as a permanent memorial on Observation Hill, overlooking Hut Point.

A Plaque in the little Norman church at Rhossili reads: "To the Glory of God and in memory of Edgar Evans 1st Class Petty Officer, R.N., and a native of this Parish, who perished on the 17 February 1912, when returning from the South Pole with the Southern Party of the British Antarctic Expedition under the command of Captain Robert Falcon Scott."
